Women across the country are ascending the ranks in the American workforce, and today's generation of female leaders continues to inspire the next.

Few understand this better than nonprofit organization Junior Achievement (JA) New Jersey, the world's largest organization dedicated to educating young people about business, economics and free enterprise. Through extensive partnerships with the business community, educators and volunteers, JA helps educate and mentor students in seven core areas: business, citizenship, economics, entrepreneurship, ethics/character, financial literacy and career development.

On May 30, Junior Achievement New Jersey hosted its annual Women's Future Leadership Forum in Central New Jersey, introducing those who inspire to those who aspire. True to its mission, the Women's Future Leadership Forum aimed to bridge the generational gap between women who have achieved professional heights and the young girls who are just beginning to climb.

Fifty New Jersey high school girls had the opportunity to meet with and talk to female role models, including KZG's Beth Dohm, who was pleased to have been selected as a mentor to the girls in attendance. The students also heard from a panel of five female leaders, which included KZG Principal Trish Zita, who shared her experiences, perspectives and advice about how to advance in today's workplace.

The eyes of the next female generation are locked on today's women leaders, and organizations such as Junior Achievement are critical to inspiring and educating today's youths about the heights of America's workforce.
